Nobody would be able to contradict the saying 'Human is a social animal.' People have preferred working in groups rather than working alone until nowadays, and in reality, the history shows a number of successful cases done by the former choice. From my point of view, people have regarded belonging to the group as an important thing, due to the increased possibility to achieve goal, improvement of social ability, and acquisitions of other useful skills from others.

First and foremost, the more people participating in a project of accomplishing certain goal there are, the higher possibility for them to gain success. In fact, relatively great deal of limitations for an individual worker exist compared to team workers. Unless the individual worker is as intelligent as Einstein, it is obvious that he will lack of useful ideas, working speed, and capability to deal with the project. In contrast, group workers inherently have higher possibility to contrive innovative ideas due to the larger scale of brainstorming, and each teammates will possess different major abilities. If each of them can utilize their skills in divided tasks, the efficiency will increase by a great degree. For instance, the smartphone mass-producing corporation named 'Apple' could have been founded due to the cooperation between Steve Jobs and Steve Wozniak. While Steve Wozniak specialized in crafting hardware of the computer, Steve Jobs played roles for obtaining advertisement and investment contracts , and promoting their products.

Second of all, frequent participation in group works reveals the person to the complicatedly entangled relationships between people. Teamwork is an activity that enables the participators to make conversations, meet new friends, and form new relationships all at once. For instance, I have confronted with a great deal of situations to talk with other colleagues after enrolling in the Student Council. While I felt really difficult approaching to others before, I could greatly improve my conversation skills through the experiences even with uses of humors to make the listeners enjoy the chat, and I became a bit more extroverted person.

Furthermore, people unconsciously imitate and learn exemplary behaviors of other teammates. If one of their colleagues brainstormed creative ideas and received compliments, other teammates are usually stimulated and have curiosity on the way of thinking of the complimented worker. In addition, only a person living and working with enthusiasm can even change the entire mood of the team. For instance, one small company was always full of silence and indifference with each others. A young woman had been enrolled, and her mood of enthusiasm changed the company into a mood of vigor and hard-working.

In conclusion, some people become even more valuable when belonging to a certain group than being alone, due to the supremacy in aspects of attaining goals, socially improving, and learning meaningful behaviors.

4. Speaking

From my point of view, people tend to belong to certain groups for two reasons.

First and foremost, presence of groups enhances possibilities to attain certain goals. With diversified capabilities of teammates, dividing and assigning the jobs for each person will probably facilitate achieving the goal in even more increased speed.

Second of all, social abilities can also be gained through teamwork. For instance, a number of moments of conversations exist during the activity, and through this, people get to learn conversation skills to draw others' attention and etc.
