Strides towards the acquisition of life convenience and improvement of the quality and quantity of leisure time have allowed the humanity a brand new form of entertainment : movies. It usually serves as a decent choice of activities for spending a meaningful time with friends or even lovers. It has always maintained its high popularity among a number of other entertainments. In reality, its familiarity stems from visual effects, comparison with imagination, and emotional advantages of movie.

First and foremost, movie facilitates amassing watchers through its visual quality of arousing a sense of addiction. Movies include unrealistic scenes either taken with high computer graphic technology or proficient actresses who can afford strict prerequisites for recording a scene. Professional video-editing skills also play integral roles in this procedure. All in harmony, watchers get to experience a sight that they have never been able to watch during the daily situations, and this is to be a totally new visual impetus for them. For instance, Steve Jobs have once obtained a big success in the field of movie by underwriting a small company with decent 3d video graphic technology which had later been an initial form of 'Pixar'.

Second of all, movie reflects imaginations of watchers upon certain situations, thoughts, or even literary masterpieces from which the contents of the movie is rooted. Such movies as Harry Potter, Hungergame, and Detective Sherlock initiated their success from books. A majority of people read the book first, comprehending the overall sequences of the original story. Simultaneously, they conceive of each scene of the story. When the movie is released, they tend to compare the scenes illustrated in the movie, and those that they have visualized themselves within their brain. During this procedure, they feel a sense of complacency.

Last but not least, movie enables the audience to easily sympathize with its characters. This is apparently revealed through comparing the differences of emotional fluctuation between experiencing the story by book and by movie. Simply reading the text cannot fully guarantee sympathy to the reader, since text is devoid of illustrative details. In contrast, movie represents facial and behavioral expressions of characters vividly, with better depiction of settings, circumstances, and appropriate background music. These emotional advantages leaves lingering impressions to the audience which are the major attractive characteristics of movie.

In overall, movie could become a popular form of art due to its visual, imaginative, and emotional benefits compared to others.
