'Dogs and cats are the only friends in the era rife with cold-hearted machines and robots devoid of emotions.' This is my mom's thought upon the presence of animal companions that bonds between human and pets are unique and valuable. However, some people inveigh against this relationship for a variety of reasons, primarily being ecological reasons. From my perspective, interaction between the two creatures are invaluable, due to several reasons : benefits to animal life, and human life, and harmony with different species.

First and foremost, the bond has positive influence on the life of the pets. Although animals are usually considered among the people not able to feel emotions or evaluate their life, it can be construed from human's perspectives. It is true that pets will prefer a life guaranteeing infinite sustenance and protective shelter to that full of competition with other entities and hazards of encountering predators in the wild.

Second of all, the relationship between two different creatures superficially reflects a possibility of a compatibility of a variety of species in nature. Humans and pets benefiting each other means that this can also occur in interactions with other species. By breeding pets, humans have formed an outlook to respect existence of other life beings. For instance, movements to protect animals has been executed throughout the world led by animal protection organizations. Since humans have always killed animals for industrial, and commercial purposes, the relationship with dissimilar species itself is meaningful, which implies that humans may stop such activities.

On top of that, the relationship also plays pivotal roles in enhancement of people's quality of life, especially in terms of emotions. People are able to gain more emotional impetus and exhibit more emotional fluctuation with pets. They are also inclined to attempt empathy to their pets in certain emotional state in order to respond to their emotion by themselves and deal with it. To be specific, if a person is stuck in to a depression, with his pet staying next to him, he first faces toward the pet, considers that his pet is also in same emotional state as him, gains relief that he isn't alone in feeling emotional depression, emulates a mental therapist trying to provide advice to the pet, and soon realizes that the advice can also be applied to himself, eventually coping with the depression. These points is revealed more important in the modern era, in which technological advancement has brought about increased proportion of machines, robots, and tele-communicational methods engaging in the society, resulting in a lack of emotional interactions with others.

In conclusion, relationships between humans and pets are advantageous in many ways both to humans and animals in terms of enhancement of quality of life, and the possibility of coexistence of multiple species.

4. Speaking

From my perspective, bonds between humans and animals are valuable.

To begin with, relationship between two different creatures superficially reflects a coexistence of a number of species. Humans and pets providing benefits to each other means that this can occur in relationships between other species.

In addition, humans are advantageous in terms of emotion. With pets, humans tend to show more emotional fluctuation. This point is especially important in the modern era, in which people lack of emotional impetus due to the prevalence of robots and tele-communications.
