If a random students are asked 'When was the most difficult time you have gone through in your life?', a majority of them will reply 'When I moved a school.' In reality, it is a period when students are nearly forced to give up original relationships, friends and environments, and subsist in an unfamiliar region with no any acquaintance found nearby. Most of them unfortunately remain alone, or even become a target of school bullying, in the worst case. Thus, in order to reduce these such terrifying cases, large friend-making programs should be executed.

First and foremost, characteristics of the form of program facilitates amassing more students in the school. For the new students to adapt to the unfamiliar environment, more contacts with local students are integral. In fact, programs include extensive promotion to people as a part of their managements. A variety of forms of publicity such as posters, brochures, and videos will be shown to school students. Some students will possibly show their interest in making relationships with the new members, and enough amount of participants will be clustered through the accumulation of this. In addition, appropriate prizes set for the participants will function as a stimulant for students. For instance, if each participants are to be given certain amount of volunteering time, considered the most attractive prize for students, secure of the enough number of students can be looked forward.

Second of all, the execution of the program leaves unforgettable first impressions about the new school to the transferred students. Most of them will feel an emotion of fear toward becoming a new target of bullying or remaining alone in classes, before moving to a new school. In this situation, if the treatments toward them are nice and friendly instead of being disdainful, with a high quality of welfare only prepared and customized for them, which contradicts their imaginations, they not only gain opportunities to overcome fears of moving schools, but also to evaluate the school positively.

Furthermore, the program is able to be prepared in a superior quality. As one of a school-scale celebrations, the program will also receive some portion of the budgets for its expansion. A more diversified choice of activities and entertainments to shorten the distance between two groups of students including recreations and sports will become available. This also contributes to the increase of the new students' faith and adaptation to the school, and is reflected to their first impressions mentioned above.

In brief, a large scale of friend-making program is necessary for the guarantee of a more convenient and enjoyable life preordained in the new school of the new students.

4. Speaking

In my opinion, planning a friend-making program is the best way to help the adaptation of new students.

First, execution of the program facilitates amassing more students. More contacts with local students is integral for the new students. A variety of forms of publicity will be utilized for the promotion of such event, and prizes such as volunteering time can also be implemented.

Second, new students gain positive first impressions toward the new school. Since they possibly had fears of school bullying or being left alone before moving the school, they will overcome such emotions through friendly treatments.
