A zoo is one of the most beloved places both for adults and young children. It is usually included as one of the choices of teenager's field trips. However, there are some people arguing that zoos have a number of problems for the wild animals to inhabit in. Moreover, zoos' purpose for protecting animals only focus on profits. In my opinion, though, there are actually a lot of things to take advantage from zoos as mentioned below.

First of all, it is equipped with favorable backgrounds for the protection of endangered animals. As there are few population of the species in the wild, they must be managed more carefully than other animals. For example, they mustn't be killed of course, by blocking any other possibilities that are likely to lead the animals to death such as stress, predators, and diseases. Fortunately, average zoos not only can afford money and time needed to be spent in these managements, but also have abilities to form optimal habitational environments for each species. Although there are some limitations for the zoo to build the environment exactly same as the wild that the animals inhabited before, it's possible to customize the environment appropriate for each animal.

Second of all, watching animals would be an attractive entertainment for the public to have relaxation. Merely watching every movement of animals can be a healing for people. Furthermore, there are numerous enjoyable programs for visitors in zoos, such as feeding, touching or even hugging animals. Some zoos even take the visitors to the real wild with a variety of animals living in, only relying their safety on a steel-barred vehicle.

Lastly, zoos are a favorable space for education, observation, and researches. Animals living in zoos can be grown in multiple ways, and their environments can be changed numerously, both depending on an animal keeper's intention. This facilitates researches on certain animals. For education, merely displaying animals and information board would be a big help for young children.

To conclude, zoo in some aspects play advantageous roles for people such as preventing extinction, entertaining, and educating. It's true that humans don't have rights to restrict animals' freedom, and thus, those who are in charge of administrating their zoo must try by any means to superior quality of environment for animals, in order to take advantage of animals in zoo.
